Daring to be Different by Harold E Kohn
The best servants of mankind have always been maladjusted to their timers.
They dared to be difficult, to think differently, to act differently.
Christ did, and his apostles did, or there would be no Christianity.
Copernicus, and Galileo and others did, or we would still believe in a pygmy universe.
Inventors did, or we would still be ploughing fields with a stick and lighting our houses with torches and candles.
The Abolitionists and Abraham Lincoln did, or we would till have slavery.
Mankind's most noble servants have refused to become adjusted to man's cruelty to man, to predatory economic practices, to the idea that disease is inevitable and useless to oppose, to dictatorships, to the persecution of minorities, to race prejudice, to narrow nationalism, to the war method of solving international differences.
For conscience's sake, for man's sake and for God's sake they lived daringly.
They rejected the premium that others put on a safe conformity and they ventured to become uncommon men.
