Reflection: Whose Image?
We are accustomed to people presenting reality in whatever way suits their purposes. We see it in public life, online, and sometimes in ourselves. In Sunday's Gospel, Jesus encounters people who are not interested in the truth. They want to trap him. But his answer about Caesar's coin leads us to a much deeper question. The coin bears Caesar's image. We bear God's image. Our lives are not entirely of our own making. We have been given a dignity, a nature and a destiny. We discover something of their meaning in ordinary experience, especially when love makes claims upon us that we did not invent. Christian faith helps us recognise the deeper significance of these experiences. We do not always respond as generously as we might. We are unfinished people. But our failures do not undo our belonging to God. We belong to him already. And through his grace, we are still becoming what he created us to be.
